One of the writers¹ mentioned several years ago in a partial report of a somewhat extensive investigation of the color sensitivity of the peripheral retina that small areas could be found in the periphery of the normal retina showing characteristics for the colors red, green, yellow and blue similar to the Schumann case for red and green. That is, areas may be found which are totally blind or deficient to one of these colors so far as the positive response is concerned, but which seem not to be correspondingly deficient in the after-image and complementary or cancelling reactions. In fact, so far as can be told, the after-image and complementary reactions are no different in these areas from those in the immediately adjacent normal portions of the retina. We found it infeasible to test for a contrast reaction in these comparatively small and remote areas. Since that time an examination has been made of the eyes of a number of observers, more especially in connection with the work of the undergraduate laboratory, with the result that although observers may differ widely with regard to the number of the spots, their location, and the color responses affected, we are inclined to believe that the presence of such spots in the peripheral retina may be considered the rule rather than the exception. A successful search of the peripheral retina for spots of the kind described above requires some means of making a rather minute...
