It forms generally in a very finely pulverulent state and tends to accumulate on or in the finest soil particles of clay. 6 The greater part of the ferric oxide is derived from the ferromagnesian silicates, such as the pyroxenes, hornblendes, chlorites, biotites, etc., minerals which have been shown to dissolve and hydrolize most readily in water.6 The readiness with which these minerals are decomposed is probably due to two facts: First, that magnesium salts generally are prone to hydrolize, as shown by the readiness with which they form basic salts, and, second, that the ferrous iron which is replacing the magnesia to a greater or less extent, is readily oxidized to the practically insoluble and inactive ferric oxide. Some of the ferric oxide is probably derived from that which as such more or less replaces alumina in the acid radicals...
